Microsoft has announced the availability of its Windows operating system for mobile devices, dubbed the Windows Embedded Standard 2010, as well as Office 2010 - which includes Word, PowerPoint, Excel and OneNote. The software giant describes the new products as the most "robust, secure and industry-leading" in its history, and as such, the software is designed to easily run on a range of mobile devices, such as cell phones, PDAs and media players. The operating system is designed to run on PC-based devices - including desktops, notebooks, netbooks and nettops - as well as other mobile devices, including PDAs and media players. Microsoft refers to the operating system as "Windows Everywhere". The Windows embedded technology offers a simple way to develop and deploy embedded systems, with the components packaged in a single ISO image, giving "repeatable, time-efficient deployment". Among other highlights, the operating system adds support for high-definition video and audio, smart cards, fingerprint scanners, camera and other emerging network and multimedia technologies. Microsoft expects to introduce an "app store" of sorts for embedded devices, allowing users to update their software and add new applications. Microsoft Word 2010 contains the most significant revisions to the Microsoft Office suite since 2002's Word 2003, with support for collaborative editing in Word Documents and other Word features including the ability to work with files directly from a remote server. OneNote 2010's "drop-note" feature lets users enter a typed note and then share, edit and add to the note at any time. The new services incorporate a new "OneDrive" cloud storage service, allowing users to upload their files to a computer that can be accessed and shared via the internet. Microsoft has also added new gesture-based icons for more efficient use of the Office programs. New in PowerPoint 2010 is the ability to create presentations that contain synchronized videos, including content shot with Windows Mobile smartphones and other mobile devices. The presentation slides also include animation effects that match the background music of the videos. In Microsoft Excel 2010, users can now analyse a group of hundreds of thousands of rows of data at once, grouping cells according to conditions and dragging the data to a region of the spreadsheet that can be sorted. Microsoft Office 2010 is available now on the Office Store and Microsoft Software Update.Q: Binding xmlns to 570a42141b
