I have a friend who reminds me of that. Recently she was feeling more down than usual. It wasn't something she was trying to be, it was something that had been slowly growing for her. I wanted to talk to her about it because I thought maybe I could get her to open up and see what could be done to change things. I ended up just reassuring her. For those who don't know, she has a very rough time right now with life in general. Her parents are getting divorced, her parents are moving to the other side of the country, she's getting harassed by the school bully and she's trying to decide if she wants to be an artist. She's basically going through some really tough shit right now and a lot of it is affecting her depression. The only thing that I could do for her is be there and help in whatever way I can. I thought about this a lot last night, though. It occurred to me that everything she's going through is reflective of what we're all going through. We all have our challenges right now, and we all need to find a way to help each other. I have my own challenges right now, but I'm still going to be there for you no matter what. I want to know that someone is there for me too. The Almond Grove Posted by The Almond Grove, which is the community of students at the University of North Carolina Chapel Hill and the surrounding community. A recent visit to the University of North Carolina Chapel Hill's Almond Grove Research Farm in the early fall found students of all ages—from kindergarten to postgraduates—working hard in the rain to harvest the first fruits of the season. Students from the University of North Carolina's College of Agriculture and Life Sciences—the organization that manages Almond Grove—pointed out the differences between the two main groves on the campus farm. The Almond Grove, which is located in the northeastern quadrant of the campus, contains one long, tree-covered row, whereas the North Grove—located in the northwestern quadrant—is an open-air field with rows of trees and dirt to grow almonds. The North Grove has its own unique set of challenges. “We’re at a disadvantage because we’re exposed to the elements and the wind,” said college associate professor Matthew Kammerer. The North Grove, Kammerer noted, has more gaps than the Almond Grove because there are more rows of trees. “The way that trees grow, they tend to drop limbs and branches and grow on top of each other, and we have more of that in the North Grove,” he said. To mitigate the risk of more limbs dropping onto the campus, the North Grove’s trees are spaced far enough apart that even if one does fall it won’t land on the College of Agriculture and Life Sciences’ property. “We’re really lucky with the students,” said professor Nada Aboudif. “We don’t have to worry about that.” In addition to working alongside student agriculture interns, faculty, and research staff, the Almond Grove also has its own farm manager who oversees work at the farm and grounds, landscaping, and other farm-related duties. “We’re a little bit more hands-on than a lot of other places,” said Jorge Martínez. The Almond Grove, Martínez said, has a staff of about 65. During the fall harvest, there are about 50 students working at the farm. The Almond Grove is also a production location for the Student Orchard Project, an annual competition held on the grounds in which students and staff with an interest in orchards design and manage miniature orchards using different varieties of fruit trees. “We’ve got about 70 varieties of trees in Almond Grove.◆
