Dietary antioxidant supplementation inhibits focal epileptiform discharges in the developing rat. Focal, macroscopic epileptiform discharges (fEDs) are known to occur spontaneously and in various models of seizures. The presence of fEDs has been proposed to result from an increase in reactive oxygen species (ROS) within the vulnerable brain. Antioxidants, which reduce ROS, may inhibit fEDs. We studied fEDs in developing rats fed an antioxidant-enriched diet. Antioxidants were added to the drinking water from postnatal day 10 to 21 (10, 100 and 200 mg/kg) and fEDs in the dentate gyrus were quantified at postnatal day 21. To control for the effects of antioxidant deprivation during gestation, antioxidant-enriched (50 mg/kg) and normal diets were fed to pregnant and lactating dams. Antioxidant feeding decreased the incidence of fEDs in the dentate gyrus by 32 and 67% in the treatment groups, compared to vehicle-treated dams. We conclude that a diet rich in antioxidants inhibits fEDs in the rat dentate gyrus in a dose-dependent manner, and that a similar mechanism may underlie the inhibition of fEDs in patients given antioxidants.Traci Grouse Traci Grouse (born April 7, 1961) is an American author. It is, on the other hand, a strong case for the federal government, under President John F. Kennedy, to approve a space probe to land on the moon, and send up a small automated robot with cameras to examine the surface in a controlled way, some six years before the Soviet Union's Luna 15 landed. Such discoveries would have altered our understanding of the moon's geological history and thus the formation of the solar system. If there was no moon, where would all those planets have come from? Well, they'd be orbiting around some other star. The planets would be much closer together; those closest to the sun would be at least twice as big as the earth, and Mars would be only 15 million kilometers away from the sun, and so far from the Earth, that the Martian atmosphere would be boiling. The moon, on the other hand, is considerably farther away from the sun than the planets are, and our nearest neighbor is not very massive; it is a comparatively tiny speck in the sky. The moon's gravity would pull the other planets away from it, so that it would orbit the earth as the system formed, but not too far away, because the gravitational pull would be weak. Mars, with its much greater mass, would be orbiting farther away from the sun, moving toward us, but then the earth would be pulled farther away from the sun, and so on. By approximately ten million years after the start of the solar system, most of the planets had fallen into an approximately circular arrangement, and the moon had become the central crescent in the sky, between the Earth and the sun. By the time of human history, the moon was so distant and small that the motion of the earth on its surface was felt only as the tides. If there were no moon, an enormous tidal wave would be raised on the earth, moving slowly toward the north or south poles, a wave that would rise very, very high, and one that might even reach up and destroy a great deal of coastal land. Most of the land area on the earth would be underwater in the next few days, and most of the people living on the coasts would die in the first few days. And if there was no moon? More complicated, more dangerous. The tides would also change direction, but not at all. A catastrophic wave would travel around the globe, and some of it would drive before the wave, burying deep into
