What's new in Egyptian Senet:

game board The Egyptian Senet board - aka Senet, Senet Mafteyah, Senet K'A, or Senet Kehabit - is an ancient game. It is thought to have originated between the 2nd millennium BCE and the 1st millennium BCE. Its board is usually made of ivory, and the pieces move with wooden pins which fit into the board in holes. Each set of 20 stones or pegs has a different color. One man placed his king/lords on the board, and three players, who were ranked more or less according to their moves, played against each other. The game has been played in Egypt at least since 1000 BCE, and until the 12th century CE. History The game seems to have originated in the Near East. The game's history before the 2nd millennium BCE is lost. It was noted in the Pharaoh Senusret III's tomb at Thebes during XIX Dynasty: "The Lord Khaemweset, Chef of the Priestly Lodge, sent for a golden board from the Lord Senusret III, mighty was the game played on it." Among thousands of pieces of ivory found by the excavations of Senusret's tomb, one of the most ancient pieces was a Senet board from Middle Egyptian necropolis at Abydos, Egypt, dated to c. 3700 BCE. Its score, purchased in the last century, stands at 349. A few pieces originate from the 29th Dynasty in the Tomb of king Senusret II, as well as from the Middle Kingdom. In the 1st millennium BCE, Senet was played in the temples of temples located in Egypt, Syria (Phoenicia), and Palestine. One of the routes by which the game arrived to Egypt was through Byblos, now in Lebanon, which was a great center of trade for the middle east. The game had become an important part of the lives of the inhabitants of the city. When, in c. 300 BCE, the Romans captured the city, they became interested in the game and started playing the game themselves. During Roman times the game grew in popularity. In Europe the game was popular in the century which became known as the "Golden Age" of history. Edouard Saincisse introduced the game to Great Britain in the 1850s, where it quickly found an audience. The set of 20 Senet pieces were originally made of wood, which was replaced by ivory in the 1870s.
