HDBaseT (High Definition Audio/Video Transport) is a new HDMI digital audio/video standard that will allow cable and satellite providers to deliver HDTV content to both the living room and the home theater, and vice versa, with true digital, uncompressed audio and video. This will give a much improved user experience when watching your home theater. HDBaseT is also an ideal transmission technology for the software-defined home (SdH), which allows content to be delivered securely, at optimal quality and cost, even if the customer chooses to receive content from a wide array of sources, be it from a digital cable box, a digital TV box or a personal computer. HDBaseT also offers a high-quality signal for speakers that use the technology, or for the display component of a home cinema. The capability of HDBaseT to transmit uncompressed audio and video will allow developers to build true 5.1 systems for movies and games, and HD television can also be displayed on conventional television sets with the addition of Dolby Digital and other content-distribution formats. "Audio and video in the home are becoming more ubiquitous, and HDBaseT will increase the number of platforms available to deliver HD content in both locations," said Brian Uhl, president of the Consumer Electronics Association.
