What's new:

i Flying Floggeri is an island in the Outer Hebrides of Scotland. Geography The parish of Seil sits at the northeast of Skye and Buachaille Etive Mor, along the Gaoth Dobhair coast. It is a prized location, private on the shingle of the Atlantic Ocean and difficult to access. The surrounding Eigg and Rhum are within walking distance. Once a popular holiday destination for summer fisherman and it was home to a well-known fishing club. It is not a village but consists of a few homes and farm buildings. The island has a very small town centre, it is a handful of houses, mostly of granite, a smithy for the hammering of metal, and a store for fisherman's and farming related supplies. It includes some farm buildings for whisky making and distilling - this is most likely the source of its tourism - and a farm shop, a butchery for deer and wild sheep animals. The bay has a pebble beach, and a sound, reaching out from the island, containing small huts that fetch an annual wage of 400GBP. The island is home to a lighthouse, built in 1835 at the top of the hill. In the pond behind the lighthouse there is a statue of the lifeboat. History Flying Floggeri is the name of the island, but today it is also known for its long-standing use as a holiday destination for fisher folk who use the sea as their livelihood. The island is situated about 20 miles (32 kilometres) from Caolas and also from Port Askaig (a main ferry destination) and Eigg. The island is most famous for its famous rock, a stack or pinnacle of hard rock, surmounted by an erosion of smooth granite. The sea around the island has been described as soft and accommodating. The rocks in the area have the potential to be castaways, but due to the softer stone they break apart. A well-known fishing club was established on the island before the development of boat trips - this club has since closed down. Tourism The popularity of the island has increased since the mid-1990s with a wave of new residents and an increase of tourism and crofting in the area since the 1980s. Fishing is the main activity on the island, and is an industry that can be traced back several centuries. In 2011 the island was put at the centre of a government survey
