. .Tether is promising to add $1 billion a month in additional liquidity on top of the $4.5 billion in Tether tokens currently in circulation. The new tokens will bring the total supply of Tether coins to roughly $10 billion, which was added last December. Most of the $1 billion will be held in accounts managed by banks and "independent 3rd-party custodians," according to a blog post by the company. The exact number of accounts will be revealed later in the year. The company will only supply up to $100 million per account per quarter, and won't keep more than $250 million in each account at any given time. The company, which describes itself as a stablecoin, believes that the new funding would effectively reduce the percentage of digital currencies that are "inflated" and would therefore hurt the risk of a crypto-bankruptcy. Tether stopped issuing new tokens in October, when it reached the hard cap of 200 million tokens. The company had limited the supply in order to drive its price up. While it still has 18.24 million Tether tokens in circulation, its value decreased by 25% since last October, when it peaked at $2.77. The company also claims that it's able to secure a source of funds for the $1 billion monthly allotment, as it writes: "Only about 10% of the global daily bitcoin markets are performed on blockchains, but the industry is expected to double over the next two years. As a result, our monthly product is aligned with the $32 billion per month total coin market capitalization of the industry." Tether's biggest challenge is to defend the company's brand, since investors may look at it as a rival to Facebook's Libra, which is targeted at Facebook's 2.4 billion monthly active users and is also backed by traditional banks. In his blog post, co-founder and CEO David Kim has said that the company is still focused on its commercial application, despite backing Libra. "The Libra Association recognizes that greater consumer adoption of digital assets is critical to the future of Libra," he wrote. "That is why more than 30 companies and organizations (Amazon, Airbnb, Coinbase, IBM, and others) are in our association, and why we remain strongly focused (NTFS and FAT32), including FAT16 and FAT12.This invention relates to methods of treatment for various forms of vascular disease. More particularly, this invention relates to a method of treatment for occlusive vascular disease, and to a composition for use in treatment. Persons who suffer from vascular disease are a frequent patient group in a hospital. This disease can manifest itself in the cardiovascular system, the endocrine system and other bodily systems. To treat this disease, it is often necessary to treat or ameliorate the cause of the disease, i.e. to intervene in the circulatory system of the patient. This can be accomplished by removing any factors, e.g. cholesterol or triglycerides, that may be the causative factor, or by treating the blood vessel itself to reduce or eliminate the propensity of the blood vessel to become occluded, thereby avoiding the condition associated with the occlusion. The term vaso-occlusive disease generally refers to a group of clinical disorders characterized by the formation of abnormal or occluded blood vessels in and around the brain and spinal cord, e.g. cerebral infarction, cerebral edema, and spinal cord infarction and edema. Cerebral infarction is the local death of brain tissue as a result of necrosis, i.e. cellular destruction, within the central nervous system (CNS). Clinically, infarction is characterized by a sudden attack of paresis (loss of strength or muscle control) and paralysis and/or sensory impairment on one side of the body, due to the death of certain brain cells in that part of the brain. Stroke-like episodes can occur at varying intervals after the disease has been initiated, and can last for minutes or for
