Physical Geography by Savindra Singh epub. Google DriveIn most electrophotographic image forming apparatuses, a charging device for charging a photosensitive body is disposed just before the photosensitive body. The charging device is disposed with the photosensitive body and a discharge wire disposed at an opposite side from the photosensitive body in order to uniformly charge the photosensitive body. The charging device charges the photosensitive body by performing discharge between the discharge wire and a conductive layer of the photosensitive body. In the case where the charging device performs discharge in a state where the photosensitive body is not disposed on the charging device, the photosensitive body is inclined by a discharge electric field generated by the discharge between the discharge wire and the photosensitive body. The reason is that the discharge wire is arranged just before the photosensitive body, and the discharge wire is disposed close to the photosensitive body. The angle formed between an optical axis of a laser beam emitted from a laser scanning unit and a surface of the photosensitive body is referred to as an inclination angle. The inclination angle varies depending on relative arrangement of the discharge wire and the photosensitive body. When the photosensitive body is inclined, a charging amount of the photosensitive body is reduced. When the charging amount of the photosensitive body is reduced, an image quality, such as density and uniformity of an image, may be decreased.Q: Getting Script Errors (Javascript) I'm an 8th grade student, learning programming.
