A: The problem is that chruby.exe which is used to create your ruby environment runs as a system process, which is not a good thing. When you run chruby.exe as an administrator it should give you a warning that the process is an Windows system process and might have low privilege. If that didn't help you, then unfortunately you are running into an incompatibility with your system or something else has introduced a security problem that limits the way chruby.exe can run. If you want to avoid these sorts of problems, then I would suggest installing ruby via rvm (RVM stands for "Ruby Version Manager" and is free to download and use). If you install ruby via rvm, then your ruby will be versioned properly and you won't have to modify chruby.exe's environment. RVM is primarily intended to manage multiple ruby environments on your system. It should be installed the same way that you would install any other app you use on your system. You would create a folder for your applications on your system and then you would install RVM. RVM is not available in the Ubuntu package manager so you would have to download the .deb file manually from the RVM website. Once you have installed RVM you could then install ruby via `rvm install 1.8.7`. If you want to get your system setup to use a ruby release that isn't the default then you can use `rvm use 1.8.7`.

Q: What's the best way to power a WebRTC video stream on a low power embedded device? I'm working on a low-power device where the only power source available is a single 1.8 V AAA battery that takes 4-6 hours to charge to full, and where there is 0.5 W of headroom to spare. I'd like to develop a system that would provide a network interface to stream videos on the device. What's the best way to do this given this limited power? Is WebRTC the right solution here?

A: WebRTC can use a video codec plugin for VP8 or VP9. You can also stream to something like gstreamer (or other video frameworks). Here are some links: talks:
