I will now invite my family members to look at it an offer to review and comment on my new shot. Once these family members approve the changes, I will share the image in Lightroom and request that they save their changes and comments to the cloud. Once that happens, I can continue editing the new file in Photoshop. Now the changes that I make appear immediately in Photoshop because the Photoshop Auto save function is set to always save changes and I am viewing the file in the Windows version of the program. Below you see the part of the original image with the Magnetic Lasso (Layer Selection) active. In the future, when Photoshop is open on my Mac, I'll be able to use Elements' Super Selection feature to select just the sky and part of the tree. Back to the new version of Photoshop. Elements wanted to change the color of the green tree. A new feature is One Click Delete and Fill. I dragged the portion that I want deleted and filled in with the new color. I ended up with the entire blue sky isolated and the tree fully green. This also worked in ACDSee. It took the face out of the bottom of the tree. With Face Recognition turned off, Elements began searching for the person who opened the file. It found the Face I had selected and made further enhancements to that face. It also decided I wanted to correct the eyes and mouth. You can see these changes inside the Lightroom Version History panel in Elements. Do I like the results?
