However, for a web browser not to be able to display the content of a web page is like not being able to see or hear. Web browsers are code-controlled by the W3C that determines what they can and cannot do. In order to not let the browser display something it should not be able to display, the W3C includes restrictive features. One such feature is the use of web application manifest files. In addition to not letting the browser display content, web applications also have the ability to restrict the browser from doing anything else on the users computer. For example, an application may depend on Internet services such as a database, or a web server. If the user clicks on a link to a web page that needs those services, the web browser may wait minutes or hours until that service has been restored. e3d0a04c9c
