A parallel group of untreated animals served as controls. In the first experiment, exposure concentrations were 0, 8, 50, and 400 mg/liter. In the second experiment, exposure concentrations were 0, 6, 50, and 400 mg/liter. One hundred fifty-four rats and 176 mice were evaluated for clinical pathology, survival, body weight, food consumption, clinical pathology, neurobehavioral effects, hematology, coagulation, clinical chemistry, and histopathology at the end of exposure. Mean body weight gains of male and female rats and male and female mice were reduced at the mid and high exposure concentrations in both experiments. Mean body weight gains of all exposed animals were similar to control animals. Food consumption was slightly decreased in male and female rats at the mid and high concentrations in both experiments, but differences
