The advertisements are commonly displayed as portions of the programs for a short amount of time. For example, television broadcasters typically insert advertisements at appropriate points within a program, such as between two separate program segments or upon the conclusion of a program. In one known method, each advertisement is typically stored as an image on a video tape of a broadcast, and an advertisement, including the appropriate time period, is selected from the tape at the appropriate time. Unfortunately, the above method is often not practical because storing each advertisement on a video tape is expensive and the number of times a certain advertisement can be stored on the video tape is limited. Alternatively, according to another known method, a program is divided into segments, and advertisements are inserted between the segments. In one known method, a television program is typically divided into approximately seven to ten segments. In addition, a television advertiser typically specifies that certain advertisements be displayed within a certain time frame, typically including a time period of approximately five to ten minutes. Accordingly, a television producer may edit the program into segments and insert advertisements at appropriate times. Unfortunately, the above method also has certain drawbacks. For example, inserting advertisements into a television program may be considered disruptive because a viewer will typically miss a portion of the program at a point where the advertisements are inserted. In addition, even if a viewer tunes to a desired program in anticipation of a particular program segment, a program segment that does not occur as expected may spoil the viewer's viewing experience.Spinal cord ischemia in giant cell arteritis. Although spinal cord ischemia is a major cause of paraplegia, it is rarely mentioned in the literature as a complication of giant cell arteritis (GCA). Here we report on a patient with biopsy-proven GCA who developed unilateral sensorimotor neuropathy. He presented with mild left-sided paresthesia, intermittent numbness, and weakness, which progressed after a hot bath or hip exercise into flaccid paraplegia. Angiography revealed a complete occlusion of the
