Movies, Magazines and more. The United States Supreme Court is back in the hot seat, and the justices are predictably at each other's throats. The clash came today over the privacy interests of a group of land conservationists who filed a lawsuit that charged the Trump administration with allegedly violating the National Environmental Policy Act. The EPA chief, which is the agency that's supposed to interpret that law, challenged the constitutionality of it. The court disagreed. But one of the justices, Samuel Alito, refused to join the opinion of the other nine. Alito would have upheld the constitutionality of the lawsuit, which means, in practical terms, that the suit can move forward. Alito's view is deeply troubling. It represents a direct attack on the integrity of the federal judiciary. Alito's colleagues were understandably befuddled by his actions. Justice Stephen Breyer, who cast the key vote to overturn a previous case that had undermined the constitutionality of the law, specifically noted that Alito had described the ruling striking down the law as "the most important opinion in fifty years." "Only our strongest instincts," Breyer wrote, "would lead us to say that the Solicitor General's position has any merit." And then Alito coolly wrote a separate opinion, in which he declared, "I cannot agree that the statute is unconstitutional." In it, Alito looked to the 17th century and the politics of the American Revolution to defend the agency that represents a clear violation of the Constitution. Not only does the president have the “inherent executive authority to act on Presidential environmental grounds,” Alito wrote, but Congress has “given the [EPA] Administrator not only the power to prescribe the basic nation-wide policies” but the “
