I guess what I am trying to point out here is that there are a whole bunch of things Lightroom can do that Photoshop cannot. In light of that, the questions becomes: Why do I want Lightroom? If the answer is "To sync your libraries", then I say, "Great!" If you're just looking to manage and organize your images, I think Lightroom offers a superior experience. And if you're looking to view interesting features like Smart previews, it's really only the beginning of the list. Lightroom 5, released on September 27, is a significant upgrade for those who have relied on it. Versioning is one of Lightroom's strongest points in my opinion. After all, who likes patches? Compatible updates are made possible whether you purchased the original version at full price, a discounted rental price, or on a subscription-based monthly rate. Lightroom has remained a dependable piece of software throughout its 20+ year history. Lightroom 5 is built on the following version of Photoshop: Version 24.0.1 (23.0.1 for PSD/AFM files). In naming the two software products, this indicates that Adobe needs to stick a pencil sideways between the front and back sets of numbers, as the software in some places has a way to differentiate the two. Lightroom 5 is entitled "Adobe Lightroom CC 2015.1", referring to the product's release date and version number. Coupled with Adobe Photography Studio, Lightroom 5 lets you process, edit, organize, adjust, and develop images. This is the program's brain. It has options for everything. Photoshop is an excellent companion to Lightroom, but it's not the only one. You can use any image processing software on your laptop, tablet, or mobile device as your primary image editing tool.

I use Lightroom on my MacBook Air for most of my image editing. I like the small size, minimal weight, and versatility it brings to the table. But, because of the way it interprets an image, you may not want to use Photoshop. I envision a situation in which my MacBook Air is lost or stolen, and I need to respond and recover my images. Lightroom is the program I would use for that. I could load my digital negatives, prints, or scanned images and pull them out of the virtual closet in which they are stored.
